Revue and "Midnight Rounders"

Open the Century Promenade

Aspiring New Yorkers who like their diversion high were provided last night with a new aerial resort of a most luxurious character. The Shuberts have converted the Century Roof Theatre, which has in its time sheltered such divergent types of drama as plays for children and a French repertoire in the vernacular, into an airy perch of cheerfulness and a French repertoire in the vernacular. The walls are adorned with silhouettes in black and gold, and a glowing orange background. Tables with waiters to serve them from an authentically kitchen with the meal best suited to the hour have supplanted the orchestra seats. The stage is connected with the audience room by the new familiar runways, and here as well as behind the footlights are the beauties of the evening.

"The Midnight Rounders" did not start until the hour in whose honor it is named had almost been reached. There are two parts and some thirty scenes in the entertainment, which comes quickly from one short specialty to another. So the effect is kaleidoscopic as the swirling curtains fall to show out one view and then reveal another. There was some dialogue by H. E. Rogers in the first scene to suggest a starting point of fiction. But it was soon submerged in the music written by Jean Schwartz and the tableaux which J. J. Shubert had prepared. They were quickly followed by the most beautiful of these managers have ever presented to the public. Never were costumes richer nor were they more original and imaginative in their design.

Perfection in these details came from the nature of "The Century Revue" and the extravagance that closes the program. While the new stage entertainments are as long and in a way as pretentious as, say, a Winter Garden spectacle, they are but miniatures of the real thing. The stage, in the first place, made it necessary to keep down the scale of the enterprise. But as much as is done in the little scene as of the regular theatres attempt.
